A. A cow's milk is made in a baggy organ called an "udder," which hangs from its stomach. Part of a cow's diet of grass and grain is used as nourishment for itself, and part of it becomes milk. Inside the cow's udder are special milk-making cells that take food materials from the cow's blood and turn them into milk. The udder has four sections that hold the milk. When a cow is milked, the milk squirts out through large nipples called "teats." Dairy cows are milked at least twice a day. Champion dairy cows give over 50 quarts of milk each day.
